Mediator Style & Process Preferences

The mediation process belongs to the parties. The Mediator is a tool or a facilitator of that process. The approach will vary depending on the needs of the parties. The goal of mediation is to be of benefit to both the counsel and the parties whether that is reaching ultimate resolution to all of the issues in the case, some of the issues in the case, or facilitating the flow of information which may enable or assist the parties to better evaluate the case for settlement at another point in time or proceed to trial or hearing on the merits. The process really belongs to the parties, and each mediation can be individually tailored to the needs of the parties depending on the unique circumstances surrounding each case. There is no one set way that a mediation must proceed, and the key is to remain flexible, creative, open minded and to add value to the parties by a fair and impartial process.

As a Board-Certified Construction Attorney and a Certified Circuit Civil Mediator, my goal is to serve the parties and their counsel in their specific goals for the mediation.
