

Tamin Madani is an associate in King & Spalding's International Disputes Practice Group in London. Qualified in New York and trained in both civil law and common law traditions, she brings a cross-jurisdictional perspective to international arbitration, navigating disputes across different legal systems and cultures. She has particular experience in energy, oil and gas, LNG, power generation and construction sectors, representing corporates, state-owned enterprises, and sovereign entities under major arbitral institutional rules. Fluent in Persian and proficient in Arabic and Kurdish, her linguistic capabilities and international background enable her to work effectively across the Middle East, Central Asia, and other cross-border markets.
